

MATERIAL GERMAINE TO LITHUANIA CONTAINED IN THE STENOGRAPHIC REPORTS OF THE FIRST AND SECOND DUMAS

JOHN F. CADZOW
Kent State University

The revolution of 1905 with its resulting October Manifesto instituted a substantial, exclusive phase of Russian history. For the first time a constitutional government, which to various degrees was representative, became a reality. Under the provisions of the Manifesto the "inviolability of person, freedom of conscience, speech, meetings and associations" were guaranteed, as well as the election of a representative Duma without whose consent no law could obtain force.<sup>1</sup>

Subsequently four separate Dumas appeared, no two of which were analogous. Elections to the First were held under a newly issued set of Fundamental Laws which was promulgated on April 23, 1906.<sup>2</sup> The Laws, which composed the Russian constitution, retained the principle of indirect suffrage and the class character of voting rights as set forth previously, on December 11, by Sergei Witte, the chairman of the council of ministers.<sup>3</sup> Under this document, however, the tsar still retained a great deal of power, and although representative government existed, it was restricted. Within his jurisdiction were the following: sole responsibility to initiate changes in the Fundamental Laws, complete control in foreign affairs, administration of the currency, the appointing and dismissing of the cabinet, and the ability to invalidate any legislation with which he did not concur.<sup>4</sup>

Nevertheless a legislative body, the First Duma, was elected, although it endured less than three months: April 27-July 4, 1906. The elections, instead of producing a conservative majority as hoped for by the government, begot a victory for the Constitutional Democrats, a moderate party which supported the constitution and parliamentary form of government. As it became evident that the Duma was less docile than hoped for and radical demands such as land reform "on the principle of compulsory expropriation" were made, Tsar Nicholas II had the Duma dissolved. This resulted in the Cadets and Labour Party crossing over into Finland and issuing an appeal from Vyborg which condemned the action of the Tsar as unconstitutional and called upon the populace to refuse to pay taxes or provide recruits for the army. The appeal was ineffectual and merely resulted in the participants being put on trial which excluded them from re-election.<sup>5</sup>

The removal of these members along with a reaction by the electorate, who now frequently choose professional revolutionaries to represent them, led to a Second Duma in which the parties of the Left and Right increased their strength. Within the Left alone there was growth of from 124 to 215 members.<sup>6</sup> This substantial increment was facilitated by the Social Democrats and Social Revolutionaries who reversed an earlier decision to boycott the Duma election, and now actively participated.

The growth of the Left and Right was however detrimental to the Duma itself. Both factions were more interested in destroying this parliamentary form of government than in carrying out any positive programs, and as a result the Second Duma was soon dissolved. Proximate to its ending was the issuance of a new immoderate electoral law which constitutionally violated the Fundamental Laws of the Empire. The franchise insured the election of those with vested interest, which became apparent in the make-up of the Third and Fourth Dumas. In contrast with 51% of its members being property owners in the Second Duma, the Third and Fourth had 98% and 96% respectively.<sup>7</sup> Thus the docility of the legislative body was assumed.

The importance of the Duma period in the modern history of Lithuania has often been underestimated. It was during this 1906 - 1917 period however, that representatives of the Lithuanian people placed before the Russian government their political, cultural and economic desires. It was also at this time that the political parties found in independent Lithuania were solidified and became viable units cognizant of the intricacies of the parliamentary form of government.

These prominent facets have in general received slight attention in contemporary histories of Lithuania. If mentioned at all, the Duma period usually receives a few cursory statements and is quickly passed over. Exceptions are nevertheless found. Mykolas Biržiška in his Lietuviu Tautos Kelias<sup>8</sup> devotes a notable section to the Dumas, as does Kipras Bielinis in his Penktieji Metai<sup>9</sup> From Lithuania a number of articles such as "The Position and Struggle of the Working Class in Lithuania During the Reactionary Period (1907-1910)" by J. An-driušaitė,<sup>10</sup> and "The Position of the Revolutionary Social-Democrats in Lithuania During the Elections to the I and II Dumas and Their Action During the Sessions" by E. Griškūnaitė<sup>11</sup> also cover this period but concentrate on one particular point of view.

The above works are however merely sketches of the much broader story, and thus in an attempt to add to the existing body as well as provide a basis for further study the following index of materials relating to Lithuania has been extracted from the Index to the Stenographic Reports for both the First and Second Dumas. The brevity of these sessions makes this possible whereas conversely the length of the latter two Dumas would make such a compilation exceedingly bulky.<sup>12</sup>

The division of this index material for both the First and Second Dumas remains basically the same and is categorized as follows:

a) List of Members of the State Duma According to Electoral Districts, which includes Vilnius, Kaunas, and Suvalkai. This not only records the delegate's name, but for the First yields also the occupation, and for the Second comprises the members' social position, nationality, religion, age, education, type of employment (with the amount of land held in the case of a peasant or landowner), and political affiliation.

b) Index of Lithuanian Members' Activities, which includes the recognition of his election, his election to various commissions, motions and statements signed by him, a list of his speeches before the Duma, and other incidental material unique to individual members.

c) Index of Events Concerning the Vilnius, Kaunas and Suvalkai Provinces and the City of Vilnius, which contains information centering on these particular locales.
